

Thailand doesn't have a talent problem.

It has a volume problem. Why high-volume teams in Bangkok, Phuket and Chiang Mai keep losing hires at the screening stage.

— WHERE THE VOLUME COMES FROM

Three hiring pushes. One team.

- 01 A 500-seat contact centre ramp-up in Bangkok.
- 02 A seasonal hospitality push across properties in Phuket.
- 03 Multinational back-office teams growing in Chiang Mai and secondary cities.
- 04 All of it screened with tools built for US or Western European hiring.

 THE CLOCK

48 hours.

That's roughly how long a strong candidate waits before moving on if nobody contacts them. In a market this competitive, the fastest employer wins the hire — not the one with the best offer sitting in a recruiter's inbox.

 THE HIDDEN COST

7–9 hours per hire.

That's the admin a recruiter spends per hire — invites, follow-ups, reminders, scheduling. Multiply it across hundreds of applicants per role and the screening queue, not sourcing, becomes the bottleneck.

CUSTOMER-FACING ROLES

An interview tests talking, not doing.

For hotel front desks, contact centres and retail floors, the real test is a difficult customer. Job Tryouts put candidates inside that scenario before you hire them. Teams using them report 30–45% lower turnover.

HOW IT WORKS

Every applicant gets a real conversation.

- 01 Adaptive two-way voice interviews, running 24/7, hundreds at once.
- 02 Follow-up depth set per question: low, medium or high.
- 03 A measured pace and neutral accent for English as a second or third language.
- 04 Shortlists returned inside Ashby, Greenhouse or Workday.

YOUR MOVE

More recruiters won't fix this.

If you're hiring 25+ people a quarter in Thailand, the screening layer has to run at the speed candidates move.

Book a demo — run one of your open roles through Sally

Full Thailand guide → link in comments ↓